POSITION PAPER

Position statement on therapeutic group-work in occupational therapy
Occupational Therapy Association of South Africa (OTASA)

1. INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT OF THE PURPOSE OF THE PAPER

The purpose of this paper is to state OTASA’s position on the way occupation-focused group-work relates to occupational therapy’s scope of practice, with particular attention to mental health care. The position paper however still holds relevance for other areas of practice in the profession. The paper further serves to guide occupational therapists to define, plan, present and evaluate their groups. This statement however, does not preclude the use of other complementary frames of reference typically used in group therapy in addition to an occupation-focused framework, for example developmental and psychodynamic approaches.

2. STATEMENT OF THE POSITION BEING TAKEN

The Occupational Therapy Association of South Africa (OTASA) affirms that occupational therapists are experts in the use of occupational therapy: Occupation, purposeful activity, and function as both a means and an end in facilitating health, and promoting participation in meaningful life roles. Occupation thus forms an integral part of occupational therapy group-work in all areas of occupational therapy practice. The four criteria for occupation-focused groups that have emerged from occupational therapy group-work with specific reference to mental health-care practice are:

2.1 A focus on occupation
Group-work should address dysfunctional occupational performance area(s). In a mental health care setting, social participation is often problematic, impacting occupational performance areas such as play, schooling and work. The occupational therapist facilitates the group in such a way that each group member’s poor social skills and impaired ability to build healthy interpersonal relationships, i.e. social participation, are addressed. Irrespective of the theme that is presented, social skills are practiced when interaction is actively facilitated within the group context.

2.2 The group has a clear goal
A goal is selected according to group members’ problem areas and needs. The goal can address psycho-social factors or any other underlying performance component that impacts negatively on occupational performance or participation in meaningful life roles.

2.3 An activity is presented
The term “activity” refers to any activity, task or occupation; for example games; pen-and-paper exercises; drama; drawing; participating in a craft activity; Activities of Daily Living: work. Once the occupational therapist has selected the goals for the group session, an appropriate activity(ies) is(are) selected which allows the goal to be achieved through participation in the activity(ies), within the group. Together, group members are provided an opportunity to practice selected skill(s), for example problem-solving and social skills simultaneously within the Here-and-Now context.

2.4 Questions are intentional and specific
The questions asked by the occupational therapist during a group, are used with a specific intention. They focus either on the problem areas identified, goal of the group selected, group dynamics displayed, specific behavior occurring within the group or any problem pertaining to occupational performance areas. Questions that focus on the “here-and-now” are recommended; “What?”, “What impact?”, “When?”, “Whom in the group?” - emphasising group members’ experiences within the group. These questions are powerful in that they facilitate reflection and insight into each group member’s experience, problem areas and on the group dynamics, with ease, which then bridges to real life situations, informing future treatment goals.

If an occupational therapist’s occupation-focused group-work meets all the above criteria, then she/he can be confident that his/her practice falls within the profession’s scope and has something unique to offer patients.

3. SIGNIFICANCE OF THE POSITION PAPER TO OCCUPATIONAL THERAPY
This position paper is significant to occupational therapy as it emphasises occupation as the primary focus of practice. Clarity of occupation-focused group-work in occupational therapy, particularly in mental health settings, provides for a clearer description of role and the unique contribution made by occupational therapists in mental health care.

4. STATEMENT OF THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE POSITION TO SOCIETY
This statement clarifies and highlights the unique contribution occupational therapists offer clients, particularly mental health care users, through occupation-focused group-work which centers on practically addressing occupational performance and/or participation in meaningful life roles.

5. CHALLENGES AND STRATEGIES
There are challenges that face the implementation of the position paper.

5.1 Dissemination and national progress
Strategies to raise awareness among occupational therapists nationally will include, among others; publication in the South African Journal of Occupational Therapy and requesting the Professional Board of Occupational Therapy, Medical Orthotics and Prosthetics and Arts Therapy, to evaluate whether the “Minimum Standards for the Training of Occupational Therapists” cover the above criteria sufficiently.

5.2 Research
Evidence-based research in occupation-focused group-work within occupational therapy practice is critical. Occupational therapy education and training programmes should encourage research in this area.

6. CONCLUSION
Occupational therapists have particular expertise and a set of skills which translate into a unique practice of group-work. Within mental health care settings, occupation-focused groups have emerged as one group practice specific to occupational therapy. While the uniqueness of occupation-focused groups transcends all areas of occupational therapy practice, community based occupational therapy -for example may have other forms of group-work not fully covered by the above guidelines. The unique characteristics of occupation-focused groups described in this position paper should give occupational therapists confidence in defining, planning, presenting and evaluating group-work as part of occupational therapy practice in all settings.
